TO THE COLLECTOR

by the Editor

Old nursery rhymes and old sayings are often packed with sound common sense. The one which comes to mind at the moment — "The squeaky wheel gets the grease" — is peculiarly appropriate to the occasion. For years now, after an Auction Sale or new issue of the Review, we have received several dozen letters from annoyed and aggravated customers, all of whom have considerable reason for their exasperated feelings. The burden of their woe is always the same. They get an invoice from the Galleries indicating that certain monies are due for coins we have mailed to them, and, two or three weeks later they are still waiting for the coins. These letters are generally followed by others sent within 24 hours announcing that the coins have arrived safely.

The Editor has felt frustrated by this situation, in view of the fact that there has seemed to him nothing he could do to rectify it. Past experience has indicated that there is little point in complaining to the Government, particularly these days. Nothing happens. "They" are right and you somehow are always wrong, wrong-headed or unreasonable. Your complaints are brushed off with a bland smile by the entrenched Civil Servant. We must now admit that it is just possible this attitude is not entirely justified. About a month ago one of our friends in New Jersey, who lives a whole half hour's drive out of New York City, wrote us a very irate letter on the subject of the amount of time packages took to reach him. In it he included some very sharp remarks about the Post Office Department. The letter was beautifully typed on his Firm Stationery, and clearly written with the fire of sincerity. We did something we have never done before. We sent a photostat copy of it to the New York Postmaster. The result was surprising. An assistant to that august official called us to discuss the problem in a very friendly sort of way, thus proving once again that sometimes it pays to make a noise like a squeaky wheel.

Now the Postal official in question made a very good suggestion which we would like to pass on to our readers. He pointed out that a general complaint gave the Post Office very little to go on. No matter how justified the complaint, it is necessary to have specific information before any steps can be taken to investigate a delay in the receipt of mail. The postal authorities must have the facts. The facts are clearly shown on the wrapping of the package containing your coins. In cases where there has been an unreasonable delay in receiving coins, send us the wrapping, making a note of the time and date the package arrived. The Editor will be glad to forward the wrapping to the New York Post Office in the hope that eventually some action can be taken to speed up the mail service. Your help and cooperation is needed if you want the service improved.

The New York Metropolitan Coin clubs held their annual Spring Convention during the first weekend in May. The Editor went and enjoyed himself at a Convention for almost the first time in his life. The atmosphere was pleasant and relaxed. There seemed to be a lot of people about who were more interested in coins than in the latest proof set and bag quotations. Considerable charm was given to the festivities by the presence of Miss Eva Adams, Director of the Mint, an alert and cheerful person who seems to like Collectors. This year produced one innovation in the form of an educational session, presided over by Mr. Vernon Brown of the Chase Manhattan Bank Money Museum. The meeting, at which there were four speakers, was very well attended — another indication of the basically numismatic interests of the Collectors in the New York area. One of the speakers was Mr. J. C. Risk who contributes to this publication. He devoted more time to the subject of the Gold and Platinum Hawaiian coins about which he wrote in the last issue of the Review.

The Editor found the Educational Session an interesting experience. Shortly after the Convention was over, however, he had cause to be confused in his thinking about the usefulness of numismatic educational efforts. As you all will remember the Galleries held their Spring Public Auction on Friday and Saturday of the last weekend in May. The edition of Coin World which arrived a few days before this event devoted a great deal of space to the New York Convention. Mr. Risk's remarks on the subject of the false gold and platinum Hawaiian coins were quoted in full. A professional friend came in to look over the lots and showed us his catalogue where a large block of bids on the Hawaiian material in the Sale had been cancelled by a customer. The reason given for the cancellation was that the man had read in Coin World that a Mr. Risk had said all Hawaiian coins were fake!!! What the moral of this is we are not sure. You can take it two ways. Either a vast effort at educating the collector is required, or all such efforts are dangerous and should be avoided! If any of our readers wishes to let us know what he thinks we will be happy to receive his comments.

Now that we've brought up the matter, it seems that the subject of numismatic fakes, copies and reproductions more or less genuine, is a live one these days. The firm calling itself "Coin Reproductions", presided over by an individual named Siegel, and dealing in the potentially dangerous imitation coins produced by one P. Rosa, once again attracted the disapproving attention of Coin World, as well as of such well known numismatists as Messrs. Kossoff and Ruddy, members of the PNG's committee on falsification. You will recollect that "Coin Reproductions" brought itself to the public notice a few months back with the patently false and silly claim that their copies of ancient coins were being made with the cooperation of the "British Coin Museum". This flight of imagination and fact produced a direct denial from the Keeper of Coins at the British Museum. The immediate uproar resulted in Siegel declaring the spurious products he is trying to peddle would all be marked "Copy". Siegel now has the effrontery to claim that "pressure from hundreds of letters" caused him to change his mind about using the word "copy". It would be interesting to know if this new claim is marked by the same detachment from the facts he has demonstrated before.

The Editor finds the whole subject of mass produced modern copies of the ancient "Roam Coins" being made available by Siegel very curious. He has always been under the impression that the genuineness of a coin was one of its most important qualities. There is no instance in recorded history where a civilization knowingly welcomed counterfeit money. Why Collectors should now be expected to purchase counterfeit coins is more than the Editor is capable of understanding. The argument used by Siegel that YOU can own genuine copies of the rare pieces only available to rich men has an unreal and un-American sound at this desk. Logic would then require a whole host of United States rarities to be made so that every citizen could own things he can't afford. Barnum may have been right after all about there being a sucker born every minute, but we hope not. Collectors who buy the Rosa-Siegel rubbish will have only themselves to blame for the eventual results.

SOMETHING ABOUT BEARDS

by

Dr. Charles Schwarzenberg

Most of my readers do not need to be reminded that political and religious symbols used on coins have taught us a great deal about the historical development of ancient and modern nations. Coinage portraits have had a traditional attraction for collectors and historians interested in the characters as well as the appearance of the famous men and women of the past. It may not have occurred to you that there is one specialized aspect of the male numismatic portrait which tells us a great deal, not so much about the person it represents, but the society and culture in which he lived. I refer to the beard. The wearing of a beard, however, has never been solely a matter of individual taste. The presence or absence, as well as the form, of man's facial adornments have always reflected current fashions and deep seated social attitudes. Such fashions and attitudes have changed over and over again. Can we discover any system or guiding motive in these changes? I propose to consider the history of the beard, using coins as illustrations, to show the reader what it can tell us about men, society and nations from ancient times to the present day.

The first coinage portraits have beards because they belong to the Great Kings of Persia. (B.11) The Persian Empire took most of its ceremonial from the monarchies of Mesopotamia, particularly from Assyria and Babylon, two Semitic nations. Not only

B11

B9

B12

do the Semitic races have a rich growth of hair and beard, but they are also traditionally inclined to consider the beard a badge of manhood, of strength, of Authority. Their beards were always carefully tended. You will remember the Biblical passage which makes Aaron's perfumed beard the very symbol of a good life. It is small wonder that the Persian Emperors should have cultivated this venerable feature.

When the Greeks adopted a system of coinage, they also put bearded figures upon their coins; but, in default of a king, they chose the mythical images of their gods and heroes. The republicans of Greece's Classic Age gave their gods and heroes the beards which they themselves wore. When the Greek world was forced to adopt a monarchical system by the irresistible genius of Alexander the Great, the traditional beard was abandoned.

The clean-shaven Alexander was youthful, but he was not so youthful that he could not grow a beard. (B.9) Why didn't he? For one thing, he obviously wanted to imitate his mythical ancestor and model, the young Achilles, who was always represented as beardless. For another thing, we may guess that he was influenced by the current Macedonian mode. Whatever the reason, Alexander set a precedent for his successors (the Diadokhoi). The Macedonian-born Kings of the East during the next three centuries were all beardless. Although customs were different in Syria, the tradition established by Alexander prevailed. Even the great Tigranes of Armenia, an Oriental if ever there was one, was clean-shaven. The beard returned only slowly to the features of Eastern Kings.

The Romans had adopted the fashion of shaving during their Republican period but they remembered that their ancestors had worn beards before razors and barbers had been invented. Accordingly, the Republican coins, which show the ancestors of noble Roman families, display in turn bearded and shaven faces. When Rome became an empire, the coins necessarily showed the features of actual and deified Emperors, who were at first all beardless. (B. 12) The only partial exception was Nero. Roman custom provided that a young man's first shave should be the occasion of a feast. Before that date, he would show sprouting down on his face. Many a Roman schoolboy was actually more bearded than a grown man. Now Nero, to show his divine youthfulness, adopted this boyish fashion and some of his portraits are lightly bewhiskered. (B. 17) Otherwise, the first Emperors were beardless and it was this custom which gave Roman artists the chance for exhibiting their psychological insight, or their psychological guessing power, in designing imperial portraits. Nothing defines the Roman military monarchy more clearly than the leathery, unintellectual features, all energy and discipline, of those two old GI's, Vespasian and Trajan. (B. 18, B. 20). But again a change was due.

Trajan adopted, or was supposed to have adopted, Hadrian, a talented young relation of his wife. Hadrian would doubtless have been called an egg-head in modern America.

B230

B229

B231

Far from exhibiting a gleaming expanse of bald skull, however, he gloried in a luxuriant beard and head of hair. Some historians think that Hadrian wore a beard to ape Greek philosophers. (B. 229) The Emperor was surrounded by a whole brain-trust of these intellectuals and they certainly wore beards, as did all Greeks of this period. Some of them, indeed, wore purposely untrimmed beards, in marked contrast to the carefully shaved and perfumed Roman playboys of the day. Hadrian and his imperial successors certainly did not wear unkempt beards. Theirs were most luxuriously beautified, and most elaborately arranged. It has been shown that the hair styles of these imperial personages were consciously patterned on divine models. This required supernatural abundance of hair proper to gods and heroes, which mortals can imitate only with artificial help. The conclusion seems obvious that the custom of wearing beards was not just an affectation of Greek culture, but a symptom of the rapidly growing influence of the East within the Empire.

While the average Roman still felt very superior to the miserable, cruelly taxed Egyptian fellaheen, Syrian princes were already receiving high-ranking Roman offices, and the Emperors had begun to discover the charms of their private farms in Asia. Even Marcus Aurelius' all too Orientalized son, the morbidly vain despot Commodus, tried to be a hairdresser's dream of perfect beauty. (B. 230, B. 231) When the Emperors were of Asian, African or Balkan origin, they quite naturally wore the beards popular in the Eastern societies from which they sprang. This, I believe, is the real clue to the new fashion for beards which prevailed until the reign of Diocletian.

After Diocletian a total change came over the imperial portraits, with the exception of Julian the Apostate. Beginning with Constantine the Great, the Emperors were beardless for three hundred years. (B. 25, 27, 32) It was not that the importance of the East within the Empire had declined, but that new influences were at work. On the eastern border of the Roman Empire, lay the restored Persian Empire under the Sassanids. The latter, careful to imitate their Achaemenid ancestors in every way, naturally wore luxuriant beards. Among the Romans, there was a strong tendency to emphasize the differences separating them from these aggressive neighbours and therefore they returned to the clean-shaven face. Finally, another force was now rapidly gathering strength in the Roman Empire—a force making for a fashion of smooth chins.

We refer here to the rising Germanic influence. Of course, the Romans knew the barbaric Germans as bearded, and we should hardly expect the forest peasants of Central Europe to have had the means to shave. But the situation changed as the culture of these peoples advanced. While the Northern peoples have changed their customs in this matter several times in the course of known history, generally it would seem they rather tended to prefer shaved faces. Smooth faces are often associated with long hair. At the beginning of the Middle Ages, long hair was the ceremonial, and indeed the magic, attribute of Germanic royalty. In the end, the Germanic peoples disorganized the Western Roman Empire, while the East, centered around Constantinople, became more and more Oriental. With the Armenian dynasty of the Heraclids, the Oriental fashion of wearing beards again prevailed in the Roman Empire of the East. (B. 36a) From the VIIth century to the very end of the Byzantine Empire, a beard was the indispensable attribute of the Eastern Emperor.

For several centuries we do not know what happened in the West, where new kingdoms slowly grew upon the ruins of the Empire, because men lost the art of portraiture, particularly on coinage. It would seem the nomad fashion of moustaches had some influence. We know, for example, that Charlemagne wore one and that they were worn occasionally even later. One of the Norman nobles who landed in England was known as the "man with the moustaches" or Als Gernons, a name now rendered as Algernon. Again, sovereigns often imitated the Byzantine imperial fashion, and the Emperors down to Frederic I, and the Sicilian Norman kings, did wear beards. Generally, however, the society of medieval chivalry was clean-shaven. I am sure that during the period of the Crusades, in the XIIth and XIIIth centuries, this custom was followed as a conscious contrast to the bearded Saracens.

The late Middle Ages were marked by an improvement in the art of coinage, and we may see on some of the fine XIIIth century groats and other coins the beardless faces with long wavy hair that are typical of this full flowering of chivalry. The whole epoch, be it noted, coincided with a period of Germanic rule. Nine-tenths of the governing class all over the West bore given names of German origin. This was also true of Latin countries, where the King of Sicily was named Manfred, the King of Spain, Alonso, the Kings of France, Henry, Lewis, Charles — Germanic names all (Charles means the churl, the peasant). This was the era of shaven faces.

In the first half of the XIVth century the fashion changed again. The rivals for the throne of France, John II and Edward III, both wore beards, as did France's allies at Crecy, King John and Emperor Charles IV. Toward the end of the XVth century, however, the society which saw the Middle Ages end was clean-shaven again. The Grand Dukes of the West — the Dukes of Burgundy; the rival Lancastrians and Yorkists; the tireless builders of united France; the Signors and tyrants of Italy; the last knight, Emperor Maximilian, and his father, the last Emperor to be crowned at Rome; that lover of good Latin, King Matthias I of Hungary; even the race of Jagiello, newly admitted into the fold of Christendom — they all were clean-shaven.

It would seem as if this fashion were somehow connected with Northern predominance — for it disappeared as soon as the XVIth century brought Latin supremacy. The era which saw the Empire in Germany dissolve into the religious and political troubles of the Reformation — which saw the primacy of Italian culture, the advance of French power, and the fabulous rise of the Iberian colonial empires — this age was bearded. The three rivals, the Emperor Charles V, King Henry VIII and King Francis, were all bearded. Charles' son-in-law, the tyrannical Christian II; Henry's nephew, the unfortunate James V of Scotland; those protectors of German Reformation, the Electors of Saxony, whose silver mines enabled them to produce such a wealth of fine coins, were all bearded. (B. 360) The custom became so strong that the very prelates, and indeed the Popes themselves, against all rule and precedent, wore beards. The first to do so was the warlike Julius II. His contemporaries said he looked like a bear, the more so as he preferred battle dress to proper clerical attire. But the fashion was followed by other Popes who were very different in character: by Clement VII who, far from being warlike, was ludicrously timid, by the amiable Pius IV, and by the saintly Pius V. It lasted throughout the XVIth century, until another change was due.

B360

You may see the transition in the two imperial brothers, Rudolph II and Matthias, and in the first two Bourbon kings of France. (B. 338) Instead of the older man's full beard, the successor has a pointed chin-beard; and the moustache is invariably turned smartly upward. In the first half of the XVIIth century, this mode prevailed in all Western Christendom. You may see it on the coins of Spain and Poland, of Sweden and Tuscany. During that time, however, a change occurred in hair styles. At first, men had worn the same short hair as their fathers, but soon let it grow longer and longer. Compare the Emperor Ferdinand II with his son Ferdinand III. (B. 341) At last no man's natural hair was equal to the tyranny of fashion and the French court invented vast wigs. We have seen in the past that men tend to wear either the hair or the beard long. In the West, both were hardly ever worn long together. The clean-shaven crusading knights had long curls, and the bearded Conquistadors had short hair. As soon as people adopted the full-bottomed wig, they reduced their beards. First to go was the chin-beard, although Louis XIV kept his moustache for a while. Eventually he shaved it off, and gradually Europe followed suit. Thus you may see King Charles II combine the wig with a very slight moustache. On the other hand, his brother, King James II (VII), whose name was given to New York, was clean-shaven.

Shaven faces were the rule during the XVIIIth century when European culture reached its summit. It was an over-elaborate culture with a social system complicated by the legal institutions of 1200 years' unbroken social continuity, and a feudal society still similar in many respects to that which had arisen out of the decline of the Western Empire. A striking symbol of the elaboration was the way in which all the ruling classes wore, if not wigs, at least powdered hair with pigtails. With these artificial curls went clean-shaven faces. The exceptions were few indeed, and they invariably belonged to professional soldiers like Leopold, duke of Anhalt, who was a Prussian field marshal. Soldiers wore moustaches because they were still popular with the Hungarians and Poles, warlike peoples of Eastern Europe who were influenced by the old nomad tradition.

The feudal order of Europe was ruined by the eruption of the French Revolution. Pigtails and powdered hair now vanished; only very conservative people still clung to them, such as King Frederic August of Saxony, or that avaricious old reactionary, the Elector of Hesse. (D. 863, 690) The new style was oriented toward that classical antiquity of which the republican French were so fond—and which the American republicans imitated by having a Capitol and a Senate. The only hair permissible on the face was short whiskers, such as one might see on the bust of Nero. With this exception, society still went clean-shaven. This custom has permitted the Founding Fathers of the United States, who gravely regard us from the canvasses of Stuart and Peale, to appear more modern and familiar than many statesmen nearer our own time.

The Napoleonic wars gave enormous importance to the military element, and soldiers, including princes who adopted military airs, like Frederic William III of Prussia, increasingly favoured moustaches. The Romantic movement, with its yearning for Nature, began to popularize the beard once more. There followed a very amusing phenomenon. The presence or lack of a beard began to have political importance. Conservatives preferred the clean-shaven look of their fathers and grandfathers. While they would admit whiskers and moustaches, the chin must remain smooth. The Liberals, on the other hand, favoured beards of all shapes. Various revolutionary democrats were conspicuous by their beards, such as Garibaldi, Hecker, and many of the German democrats who fled to America after 1848. The new French Emperor Napoleon III—who looked reactionary to Republican eyes, but was Revolution embodied for the legitimate sovereigns—invented a fashion all his own. The long thin chin whiskers, accompanying his pointed mustachios, were christened an "Imperial". It became popular with French soldiers, and with their Italian allies, whose king, Victor Emanuel II, sported a wild and bushy version of it. (D. 95, 137)

Rather typically, it was the liberal Duke of Coburg who followed the Napoleonic mode in Germany, as did the pro-French King Oscar I in Sweden. (D. 355, 824) The more conservative rulers still preferred a combination of moustache and side whiskers which may be seen in the Emperors Nicholas I, Alexander II, Francis Joseph and in William I of Germany. (D.290, 295, 27, 779) Eventually, however, the full beard itself spread into conservative circles. It was not only liberal princes like Leopold II of Belgium and Frederic III of Prussia who now wore it, although Frederic III cultivated his beard because he found it medieval and romantic. The Russian autocrat, Alexander III, also sported a full beard. Thus the very representatives of legitimacy adopted the beard. (D.53, 787, 292).

In some cases, of course, the beard acquired a particular meaning. In Alexander III of Russia, it meant a conscious and deliberate return to the traditions of the religious and national past and to the spirit of rural Russia. The Emperor was more interested in looking like a pious peasant than a medieval prince! In the case of King George V, the beard was a compliment to the Senior Service — the Navy. On the other hand, the moustache of Emperor Charles of Austria meant that he followed the regulations of his Army. (D.110)

The First World War was largely won and lost by men in moustaches, as those familiar with the appearance of Foch, Haig, Pershing and Hindenburg, to name only a few, will remember. Among the moustached sovereigns we find King Albert, King Victor Emanuel and the Germany Emperor. Of course there were a few men with beards. (D.56, 144, 791) In addition to King George, we can name his cousin, Nicholas of Russia, and the Ferdinands of Rumania and Bulgaria. (D.293, 61). Last but not least in this catalogue of hairy faces we must not omit the final winners of the conflict, Lenin and Trotsky of Communist Russia. But when the shooting stopped, the fate of the world seemed to depend upon one clean-shaven man, Woodrow Wilson, of the United States. A wave of Americanization swept over post-war Europe. From democracy to jazz, anything American was believed to be progress.

While the Americans had known some pretty odd beards and moustaches in their time, by the 1920's they had adopted the habit of shaving, to which they have since tenaciously clung. Is it entirely fanciful to find in this a trace of the fact that the northern type is the ideal of men's looks in the United States? Americans are consciously anti-racist, but they do have a few films with a brunet hero and a blonde villain. Nevertheless the chap with the black moustache is generally the Bad Man, and the hero must be blond and blue-eyed. At any rate, modern fashion, which is largely American fashion, requires a man to be slim and clean-shaven. To that fashion even royalty now conforms. In Europe, the two sovereign princes of Luxembourg and Liechtenstein do indeed have moustaches, but the five reigning kings do not. Two sovereigns are beardless for the excellent reason that they are ladies.

It is significant, too, that among the winners of the Second World War the representatives of the West were clean-shaven: King George VI and Sir Winston Churchill, Presidents Roosevelt and Truman. Both Generalissimos of the East, Chiang and Stalin, had moustaches. Stalin's moustached features entered the world of numismatics when the government of Prague advertised its vassal status by picturing him on its currency. The moustache is not at all unsuitable on his Georgian face. (D.112, 46).

Fashions always look as if they are sure to remain forever. The present fashion of shaving chins, although it demands lots of time and money, certainly does look that way. Experience teaches us, however, that change it will. In order to know how it will change, we would have to know what race and what social order will rule the future. Since we cannot know these things, we must needs be contented with a knowledge of the past.

THE FRENCH ECU AND FIVE FRANC PIECE

With today's coin market booming, and subjected to many curious artificial stimulants, pressures and inventions, it behooves the Collector to discover a neglected series, if he can. In our opinion the French silver Ecu, and the later 5 Franc piece, can still be considered a neglected series. The coins have not yet attracted the attention of those who would attempt to create a frantic speculative interest, considering their own immediate profits rather than the longer run welfare of the Collector and the hobby.

The French silver Crown is endowed with several qualities which should recommend it to the man who wants to collect coins rather than stock his "Executive Numismatic Investment Portfolio" with Numismatic rubbish in the hope of turning a quick profit at someone else's expense. It is attractive, it has variety, and it is available. Many specimens are common, but a few are rare. They can be found in almost all possible states of preservation, but really gem specimens from the 18th Century are seldom encountered. There are enough Provincial mints, each with a distinctive mark, to satisfy both the seasoned and the budding specialist. There is no better indication of the improvement of internal French communications than the gradual decrease in the number of French Mint towns as the 19th Century progressed. Attention to the location of the Mint towns themselves will tell the student much of interest about the economy of France. A study of the economy will in turn lead him to unsuspected treasure troves of information about the currency, a subject loaded with Numismatic interest.

We have listed a large quantity of French Ecus and 5 Franc pieces in this issue not only because we wouldn't mind selling a few, but in the hope of attracting the Collector to a rewarding, if unfamiliar group of coins. Some of the pieces are inexpensive and some certainly are not. Many of them are not in a condition fit for the man who specializes in uncirculated Proofs. This list will certainly give even the casual reader an indication of the breadth of the series, and the rich history of France over a period of three Centuries, both political and Numismatic.

RUSSIAN ASSAY PIECES, NOT EMBASSY INGOTS

by James Todorovic (A.N.A. 17999)

Several years ago I had the good fortune to help in cataloguing the great Russian collection of the Grand Duke George Mikhailovich. Among the nearly 15,000 items of numismatic interest, this collection contained four undated round silver pieces, all of the same design. They showed a small Russian Imperial double eagle in a blank field on the obverse, and a legend in Russian on the reverse. The legend on the largest of these silver pieces read, "990 proof (proba) – 10 zolotniks." (One zolotnik is equal to about 4.26 grams.) The other three pieces were of progressively smaller sizes, weighing 3 zolotniks, 1 zolotnik, and 24 doli ($\frac{1}{4}$ zolotnik). At the time the collection was being catalogued it was not possible to attribute these four pieces. They were tentatively identified as undated "essay" pieces, because of a lack of a better name for them, and because the Russian word "proba" may be translated not only as "proof," "standard," or "test," but also as "essay."

Since this attribution was, at best, merely a temporary identification, I remained on the lookout for concrete evidence that would disclose the origin of these silver slugs, and the purpose for which they were made. My interest was naturally aroused when Coin Galleries listed a silver 10 zolotnik piece in the Numismatic Review for November-December 1960 (#CR-285, on page 206). This listing was followed by Mr. H. M. Severin's article, "Mining Rubles or Embassy Ingots?", published in the Numismatic Review, Number 2, for 1961, in which he presented "circumstantial" evidence in support of his views that the silver slugs were "tokens" or ingots used by the Russian Embassy personnel in Peking, China.

My own investigations, until recently, had not been particularly successful in discovering any information about the ingots. The standard Russian Numismatic sources, the works of Chaudoir, Schubert, Giel, Tolstoi, and George Mikhailovich's corpus numorum on Russian coinage, all failed even to mention them. Now, it can be reported, however, that a recent Russian work appears to have provided an explanation for both the origin and purpose of the silver slugs beyond a shadow of a doubt. I refer to "Russkaya Monetnaya Sistema" (Russian Monetary System) by the well-known Soviet authority, Mr. I. G. Spassky, published in 1962 by the National Hermitage Museum in Leningrad, U. S. S. R. On page 188 of this book, Figure 152 illustrates the four silver pieces found in the George Mikhailovich collection. In connection with this illustration, Mr. Spassky writes: "The coin-like silver planchets of several sizes, with the coat-of-arms on one side, and an indication of the proof and weight on the other, the so-called "probi", are records of the Russian gold minting. Gold prospectors, who surrendered "crude" gold to the Mint for striking coins, received back the silver recovered during refining (i. e. liberation from admixtures) of gold in this form."

Spassky's statement clearly establishes that the silver pieces discussed above are neither "mining Rubles", nor "Embassy Ingots," but merely slugs or planchets of silver, which had been extracted from impure gold when it was being refined at the Mint in preparation for the striking of gold coins. The silver was then returned to its rightful owners in the form of slugs duly stamped with the Imperial Eagle, and specific weight, by the refining department of the Mint. They certainly deserve a place in the cabinet of the specialist in Russian Numismatics.

COINS OF RUSSIA

Unless otherwise indicated, all items are in silver.

"WIRE" MONEY OF VARIOUS RULERS BEFORE 1700

Included in this group of pieces in Fine-Very Fine condition are the rare little-known "Mordovki" of Finnic Speaking Mordva tribes located for centuries in the middle Volga region. Crude copies of Russia "wire" money circulated there from the mid-16th to the early 18th c. Mordva women kept them as fecundity talismans or pierced and sewed them onto garments. Mordovki are classified by Spassky (Soviet Archeology XXI, 1954) in 65 types, each with imitative but meaningless Russian legend on reverse.

OLD BOOKS AND NEW BOOKS

Dealing with

Coins of the Spanish Speaking World

We have often emphasized the importance of a personal Numismatic Library. Fortunately, today's Collector is finding an ever increasing variety of valuable books available to him.

We list below an old classic and Professor Buttrey's new handbook on the Mexican Decimal Series.

Two new additions deal with the Onzas of Independant Latin America and the Four Escudo pieces of the Spanish Empire. Both are printed in Spanish and English, with a price guide expressed in U. S. Dollars.

All these publications are well and fully illustrated.

Guttag Collection — Latin American Coins , E. H. Adams, Ed. New York, 1929.	$37.50
Mexican Decimal Coins, 1863-1963 , T. V. Buttrey, Racine, 1963.	$ 1.65
